

Constructive Resilience

The Bahá'í Response to Oppression

- 1 As long as underlying identities and interests remain in conflict, strategies of non-violent oppression will be countered by increasingly sophisticated strategies of non-violent oppression.

- 1 As long as underlying identities and interests remain in conflict, strategies of non-violent oppression will be countered by increasingly sophisticated strategies of non-violent oppression.
- 2 As long as underlying identities and interests remain in conflict, even relatively successful strategies of non-violent opposition tend to result in the transference of oppression onto others.

- 1 As long as underlying identities and interests remain in conflict, strategies of non-violent oppression will be countered by increasingly sophisticated strategies of non-violent oppression.
- 2 As long as underlying identities and interests remain in conflict, even relatively successful strategies of non-violent opposition tend to result in the transference of oppression onto others.
- 3 Opposition to oppressive social systems diverts time and energy away from the construction of alternative systems.

- 1 As long as underlying identities and interests remain in conflict, strategies of non-violent oppression will be countered by increasingly sophisticated strategies of non-violent oppression.
- 2 As long as underlying identities and interests remain in conflict, even relatively successful strategies of non-violent opposition tend to result in the transference of oppression onto others.
- 3 Opposition to oppressive social systems diverts time and energy away from the construction of alternative systems.
- 4 Oppositional modes of social change will not lead to lasting peace or justice because they reinforce the foundations of the prevailing culture of contest that is a major cause of violence and injustice.

Constructive Resilience

The Bahá'í Response to Oppression